FROM THE SPOOKY DESK OF JAMES WILLIS:

Spring is Finally Here, Right?

James

You know, as I'm sitting here looking out the window at the downpour taking place outside, I keep reminding myself of one thing; at least it's not snow!

I know that everybody likes a good, old-fashioned chill running up their spine when they're out looking for ghosts, but this past winter was ridiculous! I've always told people that whenever I'm conducting an outside investigation, I'm more worried about the living than the dead. Well, the past few months, I had to add "hypothermia" to that list, too!

I've also come to the conclusion that ghosts don't like winter weather, either. I base that on the fact that, over the years, ghostly activity, at least on the hunts and investigations I've been on, seem to drop as dramatically as the temperature does in the winter. And while you would think that the newly fallen snow would make for a perfect way to capture "evidence" (ghostly footprints in the snow, anyone), I can think of only one reported haunting in the state of Ohio where a ghost is said to leave behind footprints in the snow—the Elevator Restaurant in Columbus. And I've yet to see those, as well!

So I think that, just like the living, ghosts tend to hibernate during the winter months. That makes it a bummer if you've scheduled investigations when it's cold outside. But that's all behind us now. The temperature's warming, the birds are singing, and the trees and flowers are pushing out new growth as if they really, really mean it this time. So I think spring's here to say, especially if the amount of sneezing and wheezing taking place in my house is any indication. Of course, the one doing the sneezing and wheezing is my cat, Ernie, but that's another story for another newsletter.

Until next time, stay warm and get out there and find some ghosts!

Cheers,

James A. Willis

LAND OF THE DEAD? OHIO'S PARANORMAL COMMUNITY

Samantha

You could call it a land of the dead. That's certainly what it feels like when I'm there. What was once an active and vibrant community of passionate people is now one of growing desolation. What happened? Where did everyone go? As I navigate all of the familiar paths I've taken time and again, I'm frequently surprised to find yet another lifeless, abandoned homepage left behind to litter the Internet landscape. Sorry...did you think I was talking about an actual, physical town? Nope. I'm talking about Ohio's paranormal groups.

I started keeping track of Ohio's paranormal community years ago, shortly after joining The Ghosts of Ohio. I was curious about how many groups existed throughout the state, and I also wanted to know about their methods, theories, and anything else that might set them apart. After all, there might be new ideas that we could apply to our own explorations into the unknown. I created a spreadsheet (that I'm still using) with which I list group names, websites, foundation years, locations, what geographical areas they investigate, and finally descriptions of the groups based on what I find on their websites. Websites are the key ingredient to my research. I decided early on that I only wanted to keep track of groups that have dedicated websites, not social media sites like Facebook. My opinion is that organizations that want to be taken seriously should have real websites. Incredibly, it didn't take long for me to discover how daunting my task would be, even without the multitudes of Facebook groups I stumbled upon and dutifully ignored.

In the beginning, searching for Ohio's paranormal groups on the Internet was a major challenge. I quickly found that it wasn't as easy as typing "Ohio ghost groups" and instantly having a convenient list at my fingertips. The reality was—and still is—that the search results vary wildly depending on the search terms used. I have to do many different searches, using interchangeable words like paranormal, supernatural, and ghost, along with words like group, team, investigators, and hunters. Every combination yields new results, and I have found myself getting more and more creative with my approach. I've added the names of major Ohio cities into my searches, and I have even searched every single one of Ohio's 88 counties. Whenever I add a group to the list, I also make sure to check their "Links" page to see what other groups they might be affiliated with; and once in a while I get lucky by stumbling across small compilations of groups created by other people. The searches I've done are extensive, exhaustive, and extremely time-consuming, but the information I've gleaned from them has been well worth the effort.

There were several important things I learned after I compiled my first list in 2006, just two years after Ghost Hunters made its debut on television. At that time I had only found about 40 paranormal groups in Ohio, and it seemed that most of them had formed because of the show. Everyone used the same terminology, the same equipment, and the same methodology as the TAPS team; and they shared the same passion for investigating the paranormal. As more and more ghostly reality shows hit the airwaves—like Paranormal State, Ghost Adventures, Haunting Evidence, Dead Files, etc.—the number of Ohio's groups grew. In 2007 there were almost 90, and that number continued to skyrocket until it reached its peak just over two years ago when I was trying to keep track of almost 300—yes, three hundred!—paranormal groups. It was completely overwhelming, and it taught me how much of a motivator television can be.

The second thing I learned was that the vast majority of people who formed groups didn't really have a clue what they were doing. Nearly everyone was just copying TAPS, and most websites were so poorly written that it was difficult to take them seriously. They were chock full of misspellings and poor grammar, and ironically, many groups were claiming to be "professionals" or "certified," neither of which really exists in the paranormal field. And, since the enormous glut of paranormal groups was making it harder to get investigation requests, many tried to stand out and seem more legitimate by becoming "TAPS Family Members" or members of the "Ghost Adventures Crew," both of which are website badges that in reality don't mean anything either. Some groups wanted to be TV stars and videotaped their investigations to sell on their websites, and a few even went to the extreme and, after reading books on the subject, claimed to be demonologists who could expel unwanted spirits and perform exorcisms, sometimes for a tidy fee. (FYI...Reading books on demonology does not make someone a demonologist, and charging a fee is just plain unethical.) I became increasingly frustrated and appalled by what I was finding. I think my breaking point was the day I discovered a new group whose name formed the acronym PERVS. Could someone please tell me who in their right mind would want to call themselves PERVS, or even who would invite such a group into their home??? I had hoped it was a joke, but it wasn't. It was completely ridiculous and repulsive, and I found myself yelling at the computer screen in disgust. I learned that everyone wants their 15 minutes of fame, even if it damages the reputation of the paranormal field.

Fortunately, Ohio's paranormal community constantly changes, much like the weather in Cleveland. If you just wait a while, the things you hate about it (like PERVS) will disappear, and something new will spring up in its place. Every year I go through my spreadsheet to see which groups are still active. Inevitably, I wind up eliminating a number of them from the list for several reasons. If their website doesn't work and I can't find a new one, I delete them. If I don't see any signs of life, like upcoming events, new investigations, or updated content of any kind for one full year, they're deleted. And of course, if they've stated that they're done, then I delete them. Usually, for every one that I eliminate, two more pop up in its place. That's how my list ballooned up to almost 300 groups two years ago. But a funny thing started to happen just one year ago. Paranormal groups started dropping off, with hardly any new groups taking their place. By February 2013, my total number of groups had fallen to 116; and my total for April 2014 is down even further to around 90.

There are many possible reasons for this sharp decline in Ohio paranormal groups. Could it be that the paranormal craze reached its peak two years ago and is now waning? Or maybe television (with its motivational powers) has allowed people to become comfortable with their paranormal activity to the point where they don't need to call in the "experts." Perhaps many groups, expecting the excitement they've seen on television, have discovered that investigating the paranormal is, in reality, time consuming, tedious, and frankly boring when there's nothing going on (if they're even lucky enough to get an investigation). And maybe that loss of interest causes group members to drop out one by one until there isn't a group left. The next thing you know, the only evidence remaining of the group's existence is an abandoned shell of a website, discarded and forgotten.

I know all of this sounds disheartening, as though the paranormal field is (pardon the pun) dying out in Ohio. However, it takes rain to make a rainbow, and I see a lot of hope for those of us who have weathered the storm. With most of the 300 groups gone, it seems that those who remain have learned valuable lessons about professionalism and ethics.

EVER BEEN TO A CRYBABY BRIDGE IN OHIO?

If you have, The Ghosts of Ohio's founder and director, James A. Willis, wants to talk to you!

Rogues Hollow's Crybaby Bridge—from 2004's Weird Ohio

Willis is currently in the process of compiling what he hopes will be the most comprehensive database of all known Crybaby Bridges in the state of Ohio. And he wants you to help! So if you've ever been to a Crybaby Bridge/Tunnel/Lane/Hollow in the state of Ohio, drop Willis a line and let him know about it. What happened there? Anything? Did you hear the baby cry? Even if you think the whole story surrounding the area is bogus, he still wants to hear about it. He'll even include your story on the website when the site launches.

I have seen dramatic improvements in the way many of Ohio's paranormal groups are presenting themselves on their websites. There are less spelling and grammatical errors, and fewer groups claiming to be "certified," "professionals," or "experts." There is less association with groups on television; and those who once expressed extreme views (like provoking spirits or battling evil) have toned themselves down or disappeared altogether. Several groups are openly seeking new membership, and a few groups that were once declared dead have become active once again. There seems to be a renewed curiosity and seriousness about the paranormal, too. Several groups, including The Ghosts of Ohio, are conducting experiments and developing techniques and equipment that helps to further our knowledge of the subject. And more and more groups are expanding their interests to include cryptozoological creatures and UFOs.

All in all, I'd say there's a lot of hope for Ohio's paranormal community. It's not perfect. There are still some crackpots out there with horrible acronyms and questionable ethics. But those who had their 15 minutes of fame are finally fading away, leaving behind those of us who are serious about the paranormal. I'm excited to see what our community can discover and achieve, and what the landscape looks like a year from now. You can rest assured that I'll be watching.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCES:

Broken Glass

Marge A., Delaware, OH

My husband and I moved into this house about a year ago. It's a great house built in the 1960s by the only man who has ever lived in the house. By that I mean that he built it himself and lived here with his wife and raised three daughters here. The wife died back in the 90s but the man continued to live here long after all his daughters were grown and moved out to start families on their own. He died in 2011 and my husband and I bought the house from his estate.

When we first moved in, my husband and I would hear odd noises at night and joke about their being a ghost in the house. We didn't believe that of course. It was mainly hearing noises that were new to us. Things like the house settling. It wasn't like we really thought the house was haunted or anything.

One Saturday morning, a couple of months after we'd moved in and were finally getting settled, my husband asked me at breakfast what I wanted to drink since he found an empty glass sitting on the counter next to the sink in the kitchen. I told him I didn't put the glass there. I can honestly say that we didn't think anything about it until the next morning when I found a glass sitting on the counter. At that point, I thought my husband, who was still in bed, was messing with me. So when he got up, I decided to not say anything about the glass to see if he brought it up. He never did. Finally, I said, "Aren't you going to ask me about the glass?" "What glass?" he said. I could tell by the way he said it that he had no idea what I was talking about. When I told him I had found a glass sitting near the kitchen sink, I could see that he was a little freaked out by the whole thing.

It gets creepier. For the next few nights but not every night sometimes my husband and I would hear what sounded like glasses moving around in the kitchen. It sounded like someone was digging through the cabinets and moving the glasses around. It was so loud that that first time we heard it, my husband grabbed his baseball bat and went out to look thinking someone had broken in. We never found anything that would lead us to believe someone was in the house but every once in a while we would find a single glass sitting by the kitchen sink. Before long, we started making sure we set the burglar alarm before going to bed. As weird as it sounds, we were both more willing to admit it was a person instead of a ghost.

One night, my husband and I were in bed watching TV when he heard a crash coming from the kitchen. We both ran out and found one of the glasses, the same kind that we had usually found sitting next to the sink, on the floor and broken into a bunch of pieces. There was what looked like water all over the floor, too, like whatever had been in the glass had spilled out. If that wasn't enough, there were what looked like wet, bare footprints walking from the kitchen sink over to the side door that leads out to the garage. The footprints stopped right at the door. At first, since one of the keypads for the alarm is there, we thought maybe someone had broken in and was trying to shut off the alarm, but that didn't make any sense. The alarm was still set, too, so there was no way for anyone to open that door without setting the alarm off. We did open the door and looked out into the garage, but there were no footprints there.

We thought about calling the cops, but what would we tell them? We had no proof there had been a person in our house and we sure as heck didn't want to tell them a ghost was in the house. So we just decided to try and forget about the whole thing. That ended up being rather easy to do because from that night on, there was no weird activity and all the glasses stayed in the cabinets where they belonged.

Recently, I called up one of the daughters of the man who had owned the house. From time to time, we get some rather important looking mail addressed to him, so I try to be nice and hang onto it. When I get enough stored up, I call and the daughter comes by and picks it up. This time, when I called and did my usual how are you doing she said ok but that it was always hard this time of year because that's when her dad passed away. We got to talking and that's when I discovered some really creepy information.

The daughter I was talking to had been the one who found her father dead. Turns out he died in our house. From what the daughter said they could piece together, it looked like her father got up in the middle of the night and went to get a glass of water from the kitchen. They think that's when he had his heart attack as they found a broken water glass on the kitchen floor with water all over the place. It looked like he attempted to get to the alarm panel near the garage door to push the panic button, but he collapsed before he reached it. The daughter found his body right in front of the door to the garage.

When I told my husband he became convinced that what we had been experiencing was the former owner's last minutes on this earth. Since we both read your newsletter, we know all about what you talk about when you say there are residual ghosts that only do things at certain times of the year. That would explain why the activity suddenly stopped.

This might sound really weird but we are both sort of wanting to hear the glasses moving around in the kitchen again. We've even bought a video camera to put out there if and when it starts. We are getting close to the anniversary of his death so we will see. I will let you know if anything happens!!!

WHY SO ANGRY?

The recent rise of surly spirits

James

It seems that everywhere you turn today — movies, TV shows, and books—there's a vengeful spirit waiting to pounce on you.

Apparently, you don't get to perform basic hygiene in the afterlife as ghosts now have long fingernails, all the better to scratch you with. You do get to work out on the other side though, as people routinely talk about having been punched, kicked, and literally thrown across the room by shadowy specters.

I know a sound like an old timer when I say this, but it wasn't always this way. Back in the 1980s, when I first entered this field on a "professional" level, the number of violent ghosts on record was very small. Sure, there were reports of demonic activity going on a la the Amityville Horror and even violent poltergeist-like activity; but those were few and far between. And if you look at just those two examples, you get a pretty good idea of who is to blame for this recent surge in surly spirits: Hollywood and mass media.

As I said, when I first got into the field, most of the ghosts were benign, resigned to wandering through houses alone or tapping on doors and walls in an attempt to contact the living. By and large, most were content to simply hang out in homes and places they loved while they were alive. Again, there was always the one-off case that was said to involve violent spirits or, gasp, demonic entities. But back then, most serious researchers just looked at those cases as something to keep Ed and Lorraine Warren busy. I'm not saying people doubted this sort of activity existed, just that it wasn't widely reported. In fact, the cases were few and far between. Of course, when movies like The Amityville Horror and Poltergeist came around, people began to think that ANY paranormal activity in their home was a sign that there was an evil spirit in the house, much in the same way that The Exorcist made everyone think they were possessed. But by and large, the fear associated with ghosts was more "fear of the unknown" than the fact that the ghosts could actually harm you.

The first shift in that belief, at least that I noticed, came in 2000 with the release of MTV's reality show, Fear, one of the first paranormal reality shows to ever air. The initial premise of Fear was simple: a group of people was made to spend two days alone inside a haunted location. During the course of the investigation, the participants were made to do several "dares," most of which entailed sitting alone in the dark at one of the most "paranormally active" places inside the location. Failure to complete the dare meant the participant had to leave. Those who completed all their dares and stayed until the end got to share in the prize money.

The first few episodes of Fear focused primarily on the ghosts said to haunt the buildings and how the participants handled their fear, mostly the fear of being left alone in the dark with the possibility of a ghost being in the room with them. But as the episodes continued to air, the producers must have noticed something, namely, that the ghosts themselves, or rather the stories surrounding them, weren't that scary. While the fear experienced by the participants certainly was real, what caused them to freak out was still just the fear of the unknown and a few random sounds, which could have been caused by anything. So as the shows rolled on, the producers sort of took it upon themselves to up the ante and make the ghosts more aggressive and violent. The show itself began proudly referring to itself as "Blair Witch Project meets Fear Factor" and they even started having dares that had nothing to do with ghosts. For example, one participant had to stick her head into the center of a rat-infested metal cage. Fear-inducing? Sure. But ghostly? Not even close.

As for the ghosts on the later episodes of Fear, they became more and more violent and active, with one even allegedly being capable of "stealing souls." No longer were participants of the show made to fear for their safety, but their immortal souls, as well. The problem was, most of these violent ghosts didn't even exist or if they did, the producers exaggerated what the ghosts were said to be capable of, all in the name of keeping audiences interested and coming back for more. For the record, it's not my intention to bash the show Fear or anyone involved with it. Rather, I just want to make the facts known. A tiny bit of research online will reveal that before long, the producers of Fear started coming under fire for exaggerating and sometimes out-and-out lying about some of the reported ghost activity. In more than one instance, they found a large abandoned (and unhaunted) building and then brought in several local legends from the surrounding area, claiming they took place inside the building.

MTV's Fear only ran until 2002. While it was running, within the ghost hunting community, cases involving violent ghosts were still in the minority. Sure, Fear made the general public think there were more surly ghosts out there, but by and large, the number of people who were out there actively "hunting" said ghosts were far and few between. All that would change in October of 2004 as the first episode of Ghost Hunters, featuring members of TAPS (The Atlantic Paranormal Society), aired.

Make no mistake: Ghost Hunters did not show many ghosts that were capable of attacking and/or harming anyone. Case in point, in the original episodes, there were some investigations where the group didn't come up with any paranormal evidence to speak of. Of course, while I absolutely love ghost hunting (as I'm sure many of you do), the simple fact is that unless you are in the field, hunting for ghosts can be, well, boring. It certainly doesn't make for good television. So lo and behold, as more and more episodes of Ghost Hunters aired, the amount of evidence the TAPS team was finding continued to mount. Before long, the ratings for Ghost Hunters were going through the roof, spawning a cottage industry of amateur ghost hunters along the way. Suddenly, everyone and their brother was calling themselves a "ghost hunter" and was conducting "investigations." They all wanted their own reality show, too. The problem was how to cut in on Ghost Hunters, which was the leader in a very small market. The answer was simple: come at ghost hunting from a different angle, one that hadn't been shown yet.

What hadn't been shown yet was "ghost hunters" doing battle with dark, evil forces that could actually harm people. Case in point, Ghost Hunters had indeed filmed an episode that alleged to show an exorcism being performed, but it was deemed too "controversial" and was shelved. So what better way to make a name for yourself that to have a show that shows things the others won't?

That show was Ghost Adventures. Although what most people don't realize is that while the first episode of Ghost Adventures didn't air until 2008, Zak Bagans, Nick Groff, and Aaron Godwin had filmed their documentary about the ghosts in and around Goldfield, Nevada, back in 2004. It was not picked up and aired until 2007, after which it was so successful that they were given their own show.

Love them or hate them, there is no denying that the Ghost Adventures crew have a flair for the dramatic. Where the TAPS gang often spend entire evenings and come away with a few random knocks and bumps, Zak and crew are usually barely out of the rental car before the activity starts. Also, I've yet to see an episode of Ghost Adventures that didn't involve someone being touched or attacked by something. And I could be wrong, but I believe that all three of them—Zak, Nick, and Aaron—have claimed to have been physically oppressed by a spirit or demon, often to the point of saying they felt like they were possessed. But that was ok as these guys didn't go into the investigations empty-handed, especially for cases that involved demonic activity. For those, they'd bring in priests and bishops who, although their religious affiliations were always a bit suspect, certainly made it look like they were taking all this battling of evil seriously.

Plus, unlike their TAPS counterparts, the Ghost Adventures crew certainly looked the part of TV superstars. With all due respects to TAPS, the Ghost Adventures guys looked cooler, had more tattoos, and better hair. Plus, they were willing to take on any ghost, no matter how evil it was. Good thing, too, because just one episode of Ghost Adventures would lead the general public to believe that there was a demon around every corner, waiting to rip your throat out.

So it should come as no surprise that right around the time that Ghost Adventures was catching on, the public's perception of what ghosts were, and how pissed off they were, began to change. And with that, came the change in how ghost hunting groups operated. Suddenly, ghost hunting groups started trying to make a name for themselves by claiming they themselves could "fight demons" and could take on "extreme cases," despite the fact that none of them had the slightest clue what "extreme" meant. As far as I was concerned, and was seeing in my investigations, ghosts were still acting pretty much the same way they had all these years; benignly haunting a house or building, trying desperately to be heard. As evidence, I present to you the fact that I have been actively investigating haunted locations for close to 30 years, including some of the "most haunted" in the world and I have yet to be even scratched. Not even once. And yes, I have even been to Bobby Mackey's.

But see, there's the difference between television and reality. That's why I always say that "reality" and "television" are two words that should never come together. One is designed to entertain while the other is, well, reality. And while people actually going out and participating in a ghost hunt might be thrilling in person, even without the threat of being manhandled by a spirit, it doesn't do much for a person watching it on TV from their easy chair in middle of their well-lit living room. For that reason, ghost television shows, and the ghosts they chase, have mutated into hideous creatures that can hurt, maim, and practically swallow your soul.

So where are we today? It's hard to say, really. For while shows like Ghost Adventures still commands a rabid fan base, its numbers are dwindling. In fact, everything about the paranormal field tends to suggest that by and large, the general public is growing tired of all these "the ghost is gonna get you" shows. There have been attempts to further push the boundaries and get even more extreme, but so far, they have all failed. Most notably was 2009's Extreme Paranormal, which featured investigators participating in bloodletting rituals. It only ran two episodes and was never picked up. Even Animal Planet tried to get in on the action with 2009's The Haunted. Originally, the show's niche was re-telling stories of people who claimed to have had their pets attacked and in some cases, killed, by malevolent entities. Oddly enough, even though it aired on Animal Planet, in an alleged effort to boost ratings, the show all but abandoned the "animal" angle and instead focused on cases involving angry spirits. The show was cancelled in 2011.

As for me, I'd be more than fine if the ghosts went back to the way they were before the reality show explosion. Personally, I think ghosts today get a bad rap. Like I mentioned earlier, even though I've put myself in some pretty dark and spooky places, I've yet to come away with any physical damage to me or my psyche. I just don't think ghosts operate that way. Then again, I don't taunt the ghosts or challenge them to hit me. But if I did that, I'd deserve a ghostly smack in the mouth.

THE GHOSTS RETURN TO MANSFIELD REFORMATORY

On March 24, 2014, The Ghosts of Ohio and a few lucky friends and contest winners descended on the Mansfield Reformatory as part of our Spend The Night with The Ghosts of Ohio program.

Everyone arrived at 7:00 p.m. and, after a private tour of the entire facility, we broke into groups and were free to explore virtually every nook and cranny of the Reformatory for over 10 hours!

All in all, it was a rather quiet evening, paranormally speaking, with nary a apparition showing up. We did, however, experience a few odd noises and some possible footsteps. Oh yeah, and we're still trying to figure out what would cause the batteries in almost every single piece of handheld equipment to spontaneously die in solitary confinement. Plus, we're still sorting through a bunch of video, audio, and photographs, so who knows what anomalies might be lurking there!

The Ghosts of Ohio would like to thank all our family, friends, and contest winners for participating in what was a truly unique evening for us. Each year, we bring fewer and fewer people to Mansfield with us for the hunt in order to really create that feeling of isolation. Plus, it makes for a more exciting and memorable evening if you can say that you literally spent time alone in solitary confinement. This year, there were a grand total of 21 of us, making it the smallest private hunt we've ever conducted inside the Reformatory!

Interested in spending the night with The Ghosts of Ohio? As long as you're a subscriber to The Ghosts of Ohio Newsletter, you're eligible to participate. So just keep an eye on this newsletter for upcoming events and hope we pick your name!
